An Afrikaner Aesop.

THE HONEST FELLOW AND THE SNAKE.
A FABLE FOR THE "LIBERAL FORWARDS"—AND OTHER OLD WOMEN.

Once on a time an honest fellow found a wounded reptile lying on the ground; He, knowing nothing of such reptiles, ways, Nursed it to life again through many days Through much of weakness, weariness and pain He safely brought it—set it up again. The reptile throve—while John in store and farm Grew rich and great, and nothing thought of harm. The while the snake, to better gain its ends, Put on the grab of Virtue self and friends, The garb of "love of home," of piety, Of someone "rightly struggling to be free." Years passed away, until at last the snake Some trouble on the farm began to make; It scared John's servants, drove his sons away, And John himself had work enough to stay— That was the snake's idea of liberty. "Nothing at all for you, but all for me."

They fought—it proved a toughish job for John, Who had to turn his best snake-killers on; His sons rolled up from North, and East, and West. For all such reptile creatures they detest, And after endless trouble caught the brute And held him well and firmly under foot.

Now John was soft—old-women folk at home Urged that the snake should still be free to roam; But Bob from Canada, and all the rest, Rose at the prospect—fairly stood aghast— What! call us here to scotch the snake, said they, "Why, kill the creature, kill it right away."

John was afraid—he hardly liked their style, And at their language felt inclined to rile, But, while so firm and vigorous each word, He could not well pretend he had not heard, So he just dropped his heel on that snake's head, And left the creature badly crushed—and dead.

MORAL.

He that hath ears to hear and eyes to see Can morals find if he sets out to find them; Kind acts, if foolish, will disastrous be, And, like the snake, leave many a sting behind them;

And—

Don't make your children's sacrifices vain If you expect to get their help again. W.H. PADDON. Port Elizabeth.
